Course Summary

The MA Creative and Critical Writing seeks to advance current research in English studies by exploring the meaningful, complex and conceptually challenging relationships between creative and critical discourses. Building on the success of our undergraduate programme ranked 8th in the UK for Creative Writing in the Guardian University Guide 2022, the course brings together the study of English literature, critical theory and creative writing in a holistic and engaging postgraduate curriculum.

On the course, students will experience an integrated approach to creative writing and contemporary developments in critical and cultural theories. They will attend talks with literary agents, published authors, and other industry experts, and can complete writing residencies, undertake research at Suffolk Archives, and publish their writing in the MA course anthology. Taught 'block and blend' modules connect with and reflect on each other, inviting students to develop their creative and critical writing skills both separately and as a blended form. The course is underpinned by our shared ethos that all writing is critically reflective and creative. This approach opens new possibilities for creative fusion, innovative fiction, and original insights in academic writing.

The MA Creative and Critical Writing reflects the research interests and expertise of staff teaching English and Creative Writing within the School of Social Sciences and Humanities. The course is designed to allow students to make scholarly and imaginative connections between writing and theory under the guidance of published and award-winning academics and authors, while also benefitting from a vibrant multidisciplinary environment dedicated to excellence in learning, teaching and research. Our graduates have entered careers as book and magazine editors, teachers, librarians, research directors, museum assistants and student support officers. They have also commenced PhD study and obtained professional recognition for their writing achievements, such as being shortlisted for the Women's Prize Discoveries and receiving an Escalator fellowship from the National Centre for Writing.

Course Aims

The aims of the MA Creative and Critical Writing are to:

- provide an intellectually stimulating experience of learning and studying
- introduce students to speculative and reflective approaches to writing and reading
- encourage students to expand their thinking about the possibilities and challenges of writing (for example, aesthetic, cultural, or political)
- inspire enthusiasm for creative and critical writing, and an appreciation of its continuing social, cultural, political and economic importance
- support students in the development of their own writing, and develop their confidence through a critical understanding of their own creative process
- develop students' ability to contextualise their own work within the writing traditions that precede and surround them
- foster students' creative/artistic ambitions and support them in achieving their aspirations, offering direction and advice where necessary
- encourage students to recognise the skills and insights they develop through the programme and help them identify career opportunities to use them
- develop a high level of student autonomy and self-direction in order to facilitate the students to demonstrate initiative, originality, and integrity in their craft and scholarship.
